

What Film School Left Out

There are a number of books that each explore one specific topic relating to producing movies: budgeting, editing, directing, acting. Each of these books duplicates and supports the information a good film school already provides and film schools use the best of them as textbooks. What Film School Left Out does not duplicate the information, skills acquisition, or experiences a film school should provide. Instead it supplements those lessons and experiences and provides the context into which film school lessons can be effectively used to actually produce a commercial film for theatrical release curing film market. Current books about film production each focus on one persons process for completing their job. While this can be both useful and educational, it is an entirely subjective method for imparting the information. What Film School Left Out was written from a single point of view but then reviewed by a focus group of film students, recent film graduates, and working film producers to ensure the information presented is useful, universal, and impartial. This is the first book about film production that is truly objective as it presents information and techniques many producers need, have learned, and use. Finally, current books on film production duplicate the information a good film school provides. This reinforces the lessons in film school but seldom adds to them. What Film School Left Out does not duplicate film school lessons and experience. Instead the data and workflows supplement and add to them. In fact, What Film School Left Out assumes you have already learned those lessons and techniques a good film school provides and does not either define them or review them. If a reader has not been to film school they will have to learn those lessons from other books. What Film School Left Out is intended as the companion guide to film school not as the film school curriculum.
