Chemically induced corrosion is the means by which conventional silver prints work their magic. Light painting technique seeks to harness the natural inclinations of the materials directly, through control and augmentation of the process, retarding and accelerating the chemical interactions according to the intentions of the artist. The act of creating a light painting is very like the process of improvising a musical composition. Future decisions are made based on serendipity, awareness of the path that has been taken and potentials paths to follow, and the desire to bring forth a striking image.
