

OSS Station Victor: Hurleys Secret War

Hurley in Berkshire is an ancient village lying quietly to the west of London on the banks of the River Thames. Over the past 1000 years it has experienced its fair share of historic events, from Royal visitations to the Glorious Revolution of 1688. Modern history appears to have passed Hurley by but it has now been discovered that during the Second World War Hurley was used as a top secret communication center, known by its code name Station VICTOR. Established in 1943 by the American OSS, forerunner to the CIA, Station VICTOR communicated with secret agents throughout occupied Europe and within the German Reich. VICTOR'S role was to receive and send coded messages in order to obtain vital intelligence on Hitler's Panzer Divisions, secret weapons and industrial war machine. This is the story of Station VICTOR, from its conception, construction and operation and about the lives of those agents who risked torture and death in order to rid Europe of the Nazi tyranny. Operations such as the SUSSEX plan and the liberation of France used Hurley as their base station where even General Eisenhower as Supreme Commander and Prime Minister Churchill were seen as visitors. It is only now that the story of OSS Station VICTOR can be told due to the declassifying of VICTOR'S operational war diary by the CIA and the discovery of a remarkable set of official photographs. Hurley's long forgotten wartime secret can now be revealed. REVIEWS Even to those who have lived there all their lives, the vital role played by a tiny Thames village in the defeat of Hitler has been completely unknown... That the true story can now be told for the first time is thanks to the dogged detective work of a local historian, Phillip Williams. His discovery provides a famous new chapter in the history of a village previously known only for its 12th century coaching inn... The Times UK
